Reading I - Learning a Hard History in Class

Use this reading for questions 1 to 3.

In class, we learned that residential schools were part of a federal policy to assimilate Indigenous children. Children were taken from their families and sent to schools far from home, where they were often punished for speaking their languages. Our teacher said that this history is hard to hear, and that learning it matters because its effects are still felt today.

A community speaker visited our class and talked about language classes and cultural programs that help families rebuild what was harmed. The speaker did not ask us to feel sorry for Indigenous peoples. The speaker asked us to learn accurately, to listen, and to support work led by Indigenous communities.

Reading II - A Language Nest Opens

Use this reading for questions 22 to 24.

In a small community hall, elders and young parents open a language nest for small children. Each morning, the adults speak only the language with the children as they play, eat, and sing. At first, some parents are shy about speaking, because they did not grow up hearing the language every day.

Over the months, the children begin to use greetings and songs on their own. Parents practise in the evenings and share new words with grandparents. One elder says that the nest does not erase the past, but it builds a future in which children grow up hearing the language from birth.
