The first snow came early to the harbour town, dusting the roofs and turning the fishing boats white. Old Tomas watched from the window of his shop, where he repaired nets and told stories to anyone who would listen.

That winter the young people left for work in the city, and the town grew quiet. Tomas kept the shop open anyway, mending nets for the few boats that still went out, and writing down the stories he had heard so they would not be lost.

When spring returned, a letter arrived from one of the young fishers, thanking Tomas for the stories. Tomas read it twice, folded it carefully, and placed it beside his notebooks, glad that something of the town would travel on.
