Source I - The River Road

Use this reading for questions 1 to 6.

When June turned sixteen, her grandmother gave her a tin box of letters written by June's great grandmother, a schoolteacher who had traveled by riverboat to a small Idaho town in 1912 to open a school for children who worked in the cotton fields after school hours. The letters described long days, a leaky roof, and students who arrived tired but eager to learn to read.

At first June read the letters out of curiosity. Soon she noticed a pattern. Whenever the school lost funding, or a storm damaged the building, her great grandmother found another way to keep teaching. She held lessons under a shade tree, borrowed books from a church, and asked older students to help the younger ones. She never wrote about giving up, even when the work was hard.

By the last letter, June understood why her grandmother had saved the box. The letters were not only a family record. They were proof that one determined teacher could change the lives of many children. That summer June began volunteering at a tutoring center in her own town, carrying the tin box in her mind like a compass pointing toward work that mattered.

Source II - October in the Hollow

Use this reading for questions 7 to 11.

Stanza 1: The hollow holds its breath in October, and gold leaves drift down to the creek like slow rain. The air smells of woodsmoke and apples, and the hills stand quiet beneath a pale morning sky.

Stanza 2: The creek runs clear and cold over stones, and a heron watches from the bank without moving. The water remembers summer in its shallow pools, but the wind already speaks of winter to come.

Stanza 3: On the porch my grandmother shells beans into a tin pan, and her stories rise like smoke from the chimney. She tells of winters when the road closed and neighbors shared what little they had.

Stanza 4: The year turns, as years always turn, but the hollow keeps its roots deep in the dark soil. What the seasons take, memory returns, and home remains long after the leaves have gone.
