Elena stood on the cold platform and watched the last train pull in twenty minutes late. The wind pushed at her coat, and the station lights buzzed overhead. She had planned to read on the ride home, but the delay gave her time to notice the people around her.

An old man in a gray coat searched his pockets again and again, his face growing worried. Elena saw a small paper ticket lying under the bench where he had been sitting. She picked it up, walked over, and held it out to him. His face relaxed at once, and he thanked her three times.

On the train, the man told Elena he was traveling to see his granddaughter for the first time in a year. He said the ticket had been a gift from his daughter. Elena listened, and by the time the train reached her stop, the cold wait no longer felt like wasted time.

2 According to Source I, how many hours of sleep do teenagers need each night?

Question 2

According to Source I, how many hours of sleep do teenagers need each night?

A) 4 to 5 hours

B) 6 to 7 hours

C) 8 to 10 hours

D) 11 to 12 hours

- A 4 to 5 hours
- B 6 to 7 hours
- C 8 to 10 hours
- D 11 to 12 hours

Understand It with Pulse | Flag a mistake

Teenagers need 8 to 10 hours of sleep each night, yet many get far less. Early school start times, homework, sports, and late night screen use all cut into sleep time. When sleep is short night after night, the effects build up.

Sleep helps the brain store what was learned during the day. Students who sleep well are more likely to remember lessons, solve problems, and stay focused in class. Sleep also affects mood: tired students are more likely to feel irritable and stressed.

The article argues that families and schools should protect sleep time. Simple steps help, such as keeping phones out of the bedroom at night and keeping a regular bedtime. Better sleep is not laziness; it is part of learning well and staying healthy.

Last spring, the town of Cedar Falls turned an empty lot beside its library into a garden for readers. Volunteers cleared weeds, built raised beds, and planted flowers, herbs, and vegetables. The project was paid for by a grant from the town council and money raised at a community bake sale.

The garden opened in June with benches, a small stage, and a path wide enough for wheelchairs. Since then, the library has held story hours and summer reading clubs outdoors. Neighbors who once walked past the empty lot now stop to read, talk, and pick herbs for cooking.

Town leaders say the garden has changed how people use the library. It is no longer only a place to borrow books. It has become a gathering place where reading and community life grow together.

Have you ever wondered why some neighborhoods have no safe place for teenagers to gather after school? Our town needs a teen community center. A center would give students a safe place to study, play sports, and learn new skills after school.

Many students now go home to empty houses or hang out in parking lots. A teen center would solve this problem by offering supervised activities every weekday afternoon.

When Ana was twelve, she wrote a long letter to her grandmother, who lived three states away. In the letter, Ana described her new school, her favorite books, and the garden she was growing behind her house.

Ana never sent the letter. She worried that her handwriting was messy and that her words were not good enough. She folded the letter, tucked it into a drawer, and forgot about it as the years passed.

Last summer, Ana found the letter while cleaning that same drawer. Reading her own young words made her laugh and ache at the same time. That evening, she called her grandmother and told her everything the letter had said, and more.

Question 34

According to Source IV, what is one benefit of recycling in a small town?

A) it removes the need for any pickup schedule

B) it makes trucks travel shorter distances every day

C) it saves space in the local landfill and keeps useful materials in use

D) it allows residents to throw all trash in one bin

A it removes the need for any pickup schedule

B it makes trucks travel shorter distances every day

C it saves space in the local landfill and keeps useful materials in use

D it allows residents to throw all trash in one bin

Understand It with Pulse

Flag a mistake

Small towns face a special challenge with recycling. A large city can fill a truck every day, but a small town may fill one only once a week. Driving that truck a long way to a recycling center costs money and fuel.

Still, many small towns make recycling work. They ask residents to sort paper, plastic, and glass, and to rinse containers before drop off. Clear labels on bins help people sort correctly, and a regular pickup schedule helps families plan.

Recycling in a small town saves space in the local landfill and keeps useful materials in use. Town leaders say the program works best when it is simple and convenient, because people are more likely to recycle when it is easy to do right.

Elena stood on the cold platform and watched the last train pull in twenty minutes late. The wind pushed at her coat, and the station lights buzzed overhead. She had planned to read on the ride home, but the delay gave her time to notice the people around her.

An old man in a gray coat searched his pockets again and again, his face growing worried. Elena saw a small paper ticket lying under the bench where he had been sitting. She picked it up, walked over, and held it out to him. His face relaxed at once, and he thanked her three times.

On the train, the man told Elena he was traveling to see his granddaughter for the first time in a year. He said the ticket had been a gift from his daughter. Elena listened, and by the time the train reached her stop, the cold wait no longer felt like wasted time.

Small towns face a special challenge with recycling. A large city can fill a truck every day, but a small town may fill one only once a week. Driving that truck a long way to a recycling center costs money and fuel.

Still, many small towns make recycling work. They ask residents to sort paper, plastic, and glass, and to rinse containers before drop off. Clear labels on bins help people sort correctly, and a regular pickup schedule helps families plan.

Recycling in a small town saves space in the local landfill and keeps useful materials in use. Town leaders say the program works best when it is simple and convenient, because people are more likely to recycle when it is easy to do right.
