Source IV - Recycling in Small Towns

Use this reading for question 1.

Small towns face a special challenge with recycling. A large city can fill a truck every day, but a small town may fill one only once a week. Driving that truck a long way to a recycling center costs money and fuel.

Still, many small towns make recycling work. They ask residents to sort paper, plastic, and glass, and to rinse containers before drop off. Clear labels on bins help people sort correctly, and a regular pickup schedule helps families plan.

Recycling in a small town saves space in the local landfill and keeps useful materials in use. Town leaders say the program works best when it is simple and convenient, because people are more likely to recycle when it is easy to do right.

1 According to Source IV, what can the reader infer about a town with clear labels and a regular schedule?

- A the landfill will grow faster
- B residents will stop using bins entirely
- C the town will need no trucks at all
- D residents will likely sort correctly and recycle more often
