Source I - The Scribe's Window

Use this reading for questions 1 to 5.

In a stone room above the market town, a young scribe named Alden copied books by hand. Each morning he sharpened his quills, mixed his ink, and settled at a slanted desk beside a narrow window. The work was slow. A single page could take a whole day, and one careless stroke could spoil hours of labor.

Alden did not mind the slowness. He loved the way a finished page looked, with its even lines and bright first letter painted in red and gold. He believed that books kept memory alive, carrying stories and laws from one generation to the next, long after the people who first told them were gone.

One winter, a traveler brought news of a printing press in a distant city, a machine that could make many copies of a book in days. Alden felt both wonder and fear. He wondered what would happen to scribes like him, yet he also imagined books reaching people who had never owned one. By spring, he had decided to learn the new craft, not to fight it, because he wanted stories to travel farther than his own hand could carry them.

1 According to Source I, what is the main idea of the passage?

- A Alden restores an old printing press found in his town, repairing it until it works again for everyone
- B Alden copies books by hand and then decides to learn printing so stories can reach more people
- C Alden becomes a traveler who carries news between cities
- D Alden paints pictures to sell in the market town

Source II - On the Moor at Dusk

Use this reading for questions 6 to 9.

The wind walks low across the moor at dusk,

and heather bends like listeners bowing their heads.

A path of pale stone climbs toward the hill,

where the last light gathers and quietly fades.

I have walked this way in joy and in grief,

and the moor has kept both, asking nothing in return.

6 According to Source II, the line about heather bending like listeners is an example of

- A a simile, because it compares heather to listeners using like
- B a metaphor, because it says heather is a listener
- C personification only, because it gives heather a voice
- D hyperbole, because it exaggerates the wind

Source III - The Playhouse in London

Use this reading for questions 10 to 13.

In Shakespeare's London, a play was a shared public event. People from many walks of life crowded into an open air playhouse: merchants, apprentices, soldiers, and nobles. The cheapest places were in the yard, where groundlings stood through the whole play, close to the stage.

Because there were few sets and no electric lights, language had to do much of the work. Actors used words to tell the audience whether a scene took place at night, on a battlefield, or in a forest. Costumes, music, and gesture helped, but the spoken lines carried the story.

Plays were performed in the afternoon, in daylight, so actors could see the crowd and the crowd could see them. A successful play depended on holding that crowd's attention, which is one reason Shakespeare's plays mix comedy and tragedy, highborn characters and common ones, and fast action with quiet speeches.

10 According to Source III, what is the main idea of the passage?

- A London playhouses were only for nobles
- B In Shakespeare's London, plays were shared public events that relied mainly on language to create their worlds
- C Actors in London never used costumes or music
- D All plays in London were performed at night by candlelight, with no performances ever given in daylight at all, only by candlelight after dark
